844 Births take place under the same conditions as among the peasants in the remote corners of our fatherland. A midwife is present, who has recourse to rough methods in difficult cases, not infrequently causing the death of the woman in labor. On 553 the fifth day the child is given a name, usually by the midwife (it is usually the name of some object -- bridle, whip, vessel, cord, etc., in general whatever comes into the head). More rarely the name is given by the aksakal, and then it is given in memory of some well-known ancestor of the clan, or the name may be given by the mullah. In this case the children receive names of persons connected in one way or another with 852 Mohammed. Circumcision takes place in the fifth year. On 304 the occasion of propitious births the Kirghiz /Kazak/ do not 844 forget to arrange a feast and to celebrate this event.

Funerals are quite simple. The deceased is placed on the 764 left side of the yurt (near the entrance) behind a partition of chiy grass, and couriers are sent through the villages with the news. All those acquainted in any degree with the deceased consider /220/ it their duty to visit the deceased without fail, since by this (according to Moslem law) the sins of the deceased and of the visitor himself are alleviated. The friends of the deceased who are his contemporaries make the ablutions, and for this they receive his clothing. The others usually weep loudly and express their condolences to his family. They wrap the dead in a white sheet (or silk) called "akhret" (i.e., "the end of the world," or the clothing of the other world) and fasten it with string at the head, waist, and feet. After this he is carried out of the village to an open place, laid on the ground in such a way that the face is toward the southwest (in the direction of Mecca), i.e., the head at the northeast, and the body not flat on its back but slightly on the side (on the [782] shoulder). Here the prayer "dzhanata" (the liberation of the soul) is read in Arabic. The mullah usually asks: "was he (the deceased) without sin?" To which those present reply: "He was [783] without sin." If he was sinful, the mullah proposes that the sins of the deceased be redeemed with livestock. Formerly this redemption went to the poor, but now it goes to the mullah.
